要約問題～オリジナル練習③

To address the growing issue of homelessness, the government introduced a policy to build more affordable housing. This policy aims to provide low-cost apartments for people who are struggling to find stable accommodation. Additionally, the policy includes social services support, such as job training and counseling, to help individuals regain independence. Since its introduction, the number of people moving into affordable housing has steadily increased.

Supporters of this policy believe it offers a significant advantage in reducing homelessness. By providing both housing and essential support services, the policy helps people regain stability and reintegrate into society. Supporters argue that this holistic approach not only addresses the immediate need for shelter but also equips individuals with the tools they need to rebuild their lives, contributing to long-term success.

However, critics have raised concerns about the policy. One issue is that the number of affordable housing units being built is insufficient to meet the growing demand, leaving many people still waiting for help. Another concern is the high cost of the program, which critics say places a financial burden on the government and taxpayers. They argue that alternative solutions should be considered.
